ive American. When only just past 15 years of age he was appointed a Midshipman in the Navy, and thus began the career that has added so much to the mayal history of this Republic. The first six years of his service, that brought him in April, 1832, to his promotion to the grade of Passed Midshipman, was in the Pacific facet for four years, and the last two he served in the old sloop-of-war Experiment, that did such good service at Tripeli.

Meantime, during the Mexican war, he was on the Pacific fleet again, and in the action at Mezs, in what is now the State of California, he commanded one of the naval battalions that made such a brilliant and successful dash on shore. That was as a subordinate to that gallant Commodore Stockton the Navy knows so kindly and well. "Paddy" Rowan was also with Commodore Stockton at the assault and capture of Mazatlan, on the Mexican coast, where he also commanded one of the Navy battalions that went ashere to drive the Greasers out from their works. That dash was done at aight, but it was thoroughly done, and the battallon commander proved himself the true frishman for fighting as well as the Ohio man for gallant work. Later on, in the Mexican war days, Rowan was Executive Officer (they called them First Lieutenants of ships in those old-time days) of that historic old sloop-of-war Cyane (that the Stars and Stripes took away from the British successful battle was fought at Guaymas.

When, in 1555, the first Retiring Board known in the history of our military service had its meetings here in Washington, the result was that a considerable number of aged officers were placed upon what was then called the "Reserved List," while a good many more were "dropped." Rowan was not "reserved" or "dropped," but the vacancies created by the Board promoted him Sept. 14, 1855, to the grade

I think it too trifling to give the minor details of the service such as this grand veteran has performed, and so I will go on at once to tell that when the war of the rebellion came upon us he was commanding the sloop-ofwar Pawnee and was looking after the interests of the Union in the Chesapeake Bay.

As soen as hostilities actually began, the Pawnee was sent into the lower reach of the Potomac Liver, and the man I write of fought the very first navai fight of our civil war at Acquia Creek with the heavy battery that the rebels had built there.

Still in command of the Pawnee, Commander Rowan joined the squadron with which Commodore Stribling attacked and captured the forts that defended Hatteras Inlet, and very soon afterward was placed in the separate command of a flotilla to operate in the North Carolina Sounds.

In February, 1862, he took part with this flotilla in Gen. Burnside's assault and capture of Roznoke Island. The day following (Feb. 9), he chased the rebel gunboats well up into Albemarie Sound, and the day after forced the surrender of the whole squadron-five armed steamers and a schooner that carried two

While he made this dash he ran into a wellbuilt earthwork ashere, armed with four good guns, and the rebel vessels were ranged along shere in shelter. When the little flotilla approached, Rowan got a heavy fire that looked like destruction of all his vessels.

He was mustered out of the volunteers in March, 1866, but when the Regular Army was increased the same year to reward volunteers who had earned recognition by their services, Col. von Herrmann, who was then residing in Connecticut, was appointed Captain in the 33d Inf., but with the reduction of force that came in 1870, he was transferred to the 4th Inf., in which he served until retired Sept. 17, 1886, on reaching 64 years of age. A comrade writes to us from Troy, N. Y. protesting against the continuance in the office of Pension Agent in New York of Gen. Sigel. He says that under Sigel's administration, the pensioners living north of New York city have been annoyed by the long delays in receiving their pension money, which was not the case with Sigel's predecessors. For example, up to the 11th, seven days after the pensioners had signed the rolls, they had not received their pensions; whereas, under the previous admininistrations they have been given them within a very short time after signing. This has been the case ever since Gen. Sigel assumed charge of the office.
